

- Recipient: Althea Kireilis (OEOF)
- Purpose: To help the Taskforce understand the extent to which anti-discrimination laws have worked. Are there instances of anti-discrimination laws that have produced measurable improvements against their intended goals? For example, did gender credit discrimination laws help improve women's access to credit or other areas? Are the laws in place currently sufficient, have any had unintended consequences, or where are there needs for stronger anti-discrimination laws (WRT consumer financial law)?
- Request: Email or point us to literature on the topic or copies of unpublished papers (i.e. no briefing is being requested)
- Background: The Taskforce plans to include analysis on financial inclusion and consumer protection. The analysis could cover where anti-discrimination laws have been effective, have had unintended consequences, or remains to be needed. For laws that have been effective, do they remain effective or have any become detrimental to the groups that the laws sought to protect? This request is coupled with an alternative request seeking to illuminate where discrimination is negatively impacting historically underserved populations.
